This study would not have been possible without the financial support for my field work provided by the Research School CNWS (Leiden University), The Netherlands Organisation for the Advancement of Tropical Research (WOTRO) and The Netherlands Organisation for Scientific Research (NWO). I would like to thank the Amsterdam School for Social Science Research (ASSR, University of Amsterdam) for granting me a scholarship which allowed me the time to draft this thesis and for providing me with a stimulating intellectual environment.

My thesis was supervised by Jan Breman, Maurice Bloch and Hein Streefkerk. I wish to express my gratitude for their ongoing enthusiasm and constructive criticism that they unfailingly provided, despite their own overcharged schedules. I would like to specially thank Hein Streefkerk, who has encouraged and supported my research since 1991.

I am forever indebted to the people who are the subject of this thesis, those Betsileo dwelling in the region between Ambalavao and Ankaramena in the extreme Southern Highlands, and particularly the inhabitants of Marovato. The Marovato villagers permitted me, in their words: "to grow up with them". To be allowed to participate in their daily lives was a privilege. It is impossible to forget their hospitality and kindness, offered under such harsh and unforgiving conditions. In this regard, my assistant Ramosa, deserves special mention. While still unfamiliar with the Betsileo ways, I often had to turn to Ramosa for advice on how to "behave like a Betsileo".

In Madagascar, many colleagues assisted me in numerous ways during my sojourns. I would like to thank Rafolo Andrianaivoarivony, Albert Ralaikoa, and Gabriel Rantoandro. Special thanks are owed to Jean-Aimé Rakotoarisoa, Director of the Musée d'Art et d'Archéologie/Institut de Civilisations and his staff, for sharing the fruit of their own experience and research. I derived great benefit from their suggestions, particularly the counsel of Michel Razafiarivony, who acted as a sounding board from the beginning.

I owe my deepest thanks to those in Madagascar who, through their friendship, encouragement and hospitality patched me up after long stretches of field work and gave me the physical and moral strength to continue: Father Gerard Turk, Father Basile Ralaizafimandimby, Father Tavernier, The Dutch consul to Madagascar Van Wijngaarden and the consular staff, Fanja and Marcellin Rakotoarison, Sister Maria Gauci, Sisters of the "Bon Pasteur" in Antananarivo, Sisters of the "Foyer Notre Dame" in Antananarivo, Sisters of the "Marie-Réparatrice" in Fianarantsoa, Sisters of "Saint Joseph de Cluny" in Ambalavao.

My colleagues were there for me in many ways, and at several critical junctures: Claude Allibert, Stephen Ellis, Frances Gouda, Peter Geschiere, Paul Lovejoy, Sabine Luning, Karen Middleton, Ot van den Muijzenberg, Narivelo Rajaonarimanana, Solofo Randrianja, Yvette and Raymond Ranjeva, Robert Ross, Marc Spindler, Patricia Spyer, Wim Stokhof, Bonno Thoden van Velsen, Klaas van der Veen, Pierre Vérin, Nigel Worden.

Wim Stokhof and Marc Spindler gave me the opportunity to organise the 1994 Leiden conference on Madagascar, which laid the groundwork for much of my subsequent research.

I offer my warmest thanks to my parents and sister. I can only begin to imagine what it must have been for them to see me leave for a place they still hardly knew on the eve of my departure. Their sole knowledge of my destination was acquired in a newspaper article which included a map showing Madagascar as a dark red zone, corresponding with the danger the country would entail for visitors. My mother and sister engaged in a writing competition, keeping me updated on current events back home through their letters and newspaper clippings. Following my return, family and friends continued their support throughout the drafting of the thesis.

Alessandra Milicic and Bennie Evers put their talents at my service to create respectively the Madagascar and Marovato maps.

I would like to thank David MacKinnon for his ongoing enthusiasm for my work and his valuable editorial advice.

It should be added, in conclusion, that any errors in interpretation or translation are entirely my responsibility.
