

Downloaded from UvA-DARE, the institutional repository of the University of Amsterdam (UvA)
<http://hdl.handle.net/11245/2.61781>

File ID uvapub:61781
Filename Penninx_WP21-MigrationpolicymakinginSpain.pdf
Version unknown

SOURCE (OR PART OF THE FOLLOWING SOURCE):

Type report
Title Immigration and integration policymaking in Spain
Author(s) M. Bruquetas-Callejo, B. Garcés-Mascareñas, R. Morén-Alegret, R. Penninx,
 E. Ruiz-Vieytez
Faculty FMG: Institute for Migration & Ethnic Studies (IMES)
Year 2008

FULL BIBLIOGRAPHIC DETAILS:

<http://hdl.handle.net/11245/1.293116>

Copyright

It is not permitted to download or to forward/distribute the text or part of it without the consent of the author(s) and/or copyright holder(s), other than for strictly personal, individual use, unless the work is under an open content licence (like Creative Commons).

IMISCOE Working Paper

IMMIGRATION AND INTEGRATION POLICYMAKING IN SPAIN

María Bruquetas-Callejo, Blanca Garcés-Mascareñas, Ricard Morén-Alegret, Rinus Penninx and Eduardo Ruiz-Vieitez¹

*Working Paper No. 21
April 2008*

¹ María Bruquetas-Callejo, Blanca Garcés-Mascareñas and Rinus Penninx are affiliated with the Institute of Migration and Ethnic Studies of the University of Amsterdam. Ricard Morén-Alegret works in the Migration Research Group/Department of Geography at the Autonomous University of Barcelona. Eduardo Ruiz-Vieitez is affiliated with the Human Rights Institute/Law Faculty at Deusto University in Bilbao. This chapter expounds on an IMISCOE Working Paper by Ricard Morén-Alegret (2005a). The authors are grateful to Joan Subirats' and Lorenzo Cachon's contributions to earlier versions of this chapter. We thank Karina Hof for editing this chapter thoroughly.

Preface

The paper provides an overview of policymaking in Spain relying upon bits and pieces of research conducted from angles other than the one adopted in this study. The paper first outlines the principal characteristics of immigration in Spain. This is followed by a bird's-eye view of the evolution of migration and integration policies. In the next sections, the focus is on immigration policies and integration policies, respectively. The analysis carried out does not deal just with their formal content as laid down in official documents, but also explores their implementation, thereby describing wherever possible which actors are involved. In an attempt to go beyond a mere outline of institutional arrangements and actors involved, a basic description of the process of policymaking in the fields of Spanish immigration and integration is provided.

This working paper is part of a wider project of publication on the policymaking on immigration and integration in Europe which is the product of the work of IMISCOE Cluster C9 on “The multilevel governance of migration” (in course of preparation with Amsterdam University Press). The book intends to cope with an evident gap in the literature which so far has just focused on the content of immigrant and immigration policies. The publication ‘Migratory Policy-Making in Europe’ instead is based on essays that describe policymaking processes in ten different European countries, i.e. Austria, Czech Republic, France, Germany, Italy, Netherlands, Poland, Spain, Switzerland and the UK.

- Prof. Giovanna Zincone
FIERI – Forum Internazionale ed Europeo di Ricerche sull’Immigrazione, Italia

1. Introduction

Foreign migration to Spain is relatively recent and consequently so are policies related to both immigration² and the integration of immigrants. The first law dealing with these issues was the Ley de Extranjería, the Law on the Rights and Freedoms of Foreigners in Spain (from herein referred to simply as the Foreigners Law), which was enacted in 1985, just a year before Spain joined the European Communities. At that time, there were merely 250,000 legal foreign residents in the country (Watts 1998: 661). During the last two decades, however, immigration flows have swelled significantly, thus producing a completely new demographic situation. Today the nation hosts more than four and a half million foreign residents, which represents about 10 per cent of the total population³. This makes Spain one of the European Union's leading immigration countries. Spain's percentage of immigrants in relation to its total population has reached a level comparable to that of other North-West European countries. This growth has been especially visible in certain regions such as Madrid, Catalonia, Andalusia, Murcia, Valencia, the Balearic Islands and the Canary Islands. This particular background makes the Spanish case an interesting one to contrast with other North-West and Central European countries. A long-standing tradition of emigration that lasted up until just recently and the increasing momentum that immigration has gathered in two decades have geared Spanish policymaking to a starting point distinct from others that came before it.

Studying Spanish policymaking in these fields, however, is not easy. Although there is a fast-growing body of scientific literature on Spanish immigration and the social processes of newcomers' integration into Spanish society, very little research has been systematically undertaken to examine the processes of how policies in these fields are made (Agrela Romero & Gil Araujo 2005; Carrillo & Delgado 1998; Casey 1998; Lopez Sala 2005b; Morén-Alegret 2005a; Ramos et al. 1998; Ramos & Bazaga 2002; Ruiz Vieytez 2003; Tamayo & Delgado 1998; Tamayo & Carrillo 2002; Zapata 2002, 2003). Most literature on policies deals with the content of policies. Even works that specifically focus on the making of policies do not offer a comprehensive view: focus falls either solely on immigration or integration; merely one aspect of either field is analysed; or only a static description is given of relations between actors at a given moment in time.

This overview of policymaking in Spain thus relies on bits and pieces of research conducted from angles other than the one with which we approach this study. As such, this chapter will be constructed somewhat differently than the others in this book. To provide background, we will first outline the principal characteristics of immigration in Spain. This will be followed by a bird's-eye view of the evolution of migration and integration policies. In the next sections, we will zoom in on immigration policies and integration policies, respectively. We will delve not only into their formal content as laid down in official documents, but also explore their implementation, thereby describing wherever possible which actors are involved. In an attempt to go beyond a mere outline of institutional arrangements and actors involved, we have assembled what was previously scattered information to produce a basic description of the process of policymaking in the fields of Spanish immigration and integration.

² Unless specified otherwise, 'immigration' and 'immigrant' refers to non-Spanish migrants.

³ On 1 January 2007, INE data accounted for 45,200,737 inhabitants of Spain (www.ine.es); among this population were 4,519,554 foreign residents, i.e. 9.99% of the total population (not including immigrants who acquired Spanish nationality).

2. Background and characteristics of immigration in Spain

Spain has had a long and complex migration history, primarily as an emigration country and an exporter of labour. It was only in the mid-1980s that the country experienced a visible reversal of migration patterns. For most of the 20th century, internal migration and international emigration were key factors determining the distribution of Spain's population at the time. Both flows were mainly rural-urban ones. Catalonia, the Madrid Metropolitan Area and the Basque Country (the three regions where most industry was concentrated) were the nation's main areas of destination, while Andalusia, Extremadura and Galicia experienced the most emigration. Spain's international emigrants departed for urban areas in European countries like Germany and France, as well as some Latin American countries. This resulted in an unequal distribution of the population never before paralleled. The situation was not unique to Spain, however. Throughout most of the 20th century, Portugal, Italy and Greece were also characterised as emigration countries.

Explaining why these countries became immigration countries during the 1980s and 1990s, King, Fielding and Black (1997) point to internal migration patterns and the demand for labour. Their model highlights three specific trends from the 1950s to the 1990s: the coexistence of high- and low-productivity sectors; the rapid transfer of indigenous workers from low- to high-productivity sectors through short- or long-distance migration; and the rapid decline of an available supply of indigenous labour in rural areas. The late 1980s and 1990s ushered in a new phase for Spain altogether, as a reduced rate of investment was combined with economic restructuring, recession and high unemployment. Since low wages were the only means for businesses to retain a competitive edge, employers turned to immigrant workers. Labour immigration to Southern Europe was thus not only a matter of supply, but also a particular response to employers' demands for cheap labour (Calavita 2005: 68). As shown in Table 1, immigration rose to unprecedented levels, notably beginning in 2000. This rapid growth was linked to a booming Spanish economy driven by expansion of the housing market (and subsequent construction industry) as well as Spain's strong foothold in the tourist industry. These economic developments went hand in hand with a rather lenient governmental immigration policy.

Table 1. Annual inflow of foreigners in Spain, 1998 – 2006

Annual inflow of foreigners	Year
	1998	2000	2002	2004	2006
	57,195	330,881	443,085	645,844	802,971

Source: Estadística de Variaciones Residenciales (Statistics of Residential Movements) INE

The present-day immigrant population with its more than four million people registered in local censuses, therefore also including undocumented immigrants, presents very diverse origins. As shown in Table 2, the largest groups are Moroccans and Ecuadorians, each comprising a total of approximately half a million. Romanians, Colombians and British nationals each comprise over one quarter of a million. Many other nationalities are represented in another two million foreigners. As Table 2 also shows, there is a sizeable immigrant population from the EU-25, of which a significant part corresponds to the migration of pensioners of North-Western Europe (from the United Kingdom and Germany). Moreover, there is a sizeable new immigration of economic migrants from Central and Eastern Europe, namely, Romania and Bulgaria. Latin Americans account for another important share of immigrants, their high percentages being a reflection of preferential treatment in legislation as well as the effects of reviving old social networks.

Table 2. Foreign population according to local register, 1 January 2006

Origin	Foreign population
EUROPE	1,609,856
EU25	918,886
United Kingdom	274,722
REST EUROPE	690,970
Romania	407,159
AFRICA	785,279
Morocco	563,012
AMERICA	1,528,077
Ecuador	461,310
ASIA	217,918
China	104,681
OCEANIA	2,363
Australia	1,633
TOTAL	4,144,166

Source: National Institute of Statistics 2006 / Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs

As Map 1 shows, the highest levels of immigrant concentrations, both in relative and absolute numbers, are to be found in five main areas:

1) The Mediterranean Coast This coastal strip accounts primarily for the main Spanish tourist resorts and attracts a diverse flow of well-off sunbelt immigrants from EU countries as well as economic migrants from low-wage countries. Secondly, the area includes some of the most populated and economically dynamic areas in terms of industry and services, such as Barcelona, Valencia, Alicante and Tarragona. Thirdly, some of the most intensive export-oriented agricultural areas (headed by Murcia and Almeria) are also to be found in this area.

2) The Balearic Islands and the Canary Islands These islands constitute the main point of attraction for foreigners coming from Northern and Western European, including retirees, business people and working students.

3) The Madrid Metropolitan Area The capital of Spain and its surrounds is the country's most populated territory, where the service sector and the construction industry have generated an increasing demand for immigrant labour.

4) The Ebro River Valley Foreign labour migrants are attracted to this region because of its wine production and a diversity of fruits crops, together with a growing industrial and service sector.

5) Western and South-Western Spain's agricultural enclaves Foreign labour migrants are attracted to these spots by their agricultural prospects. Favourite destinations are Huelva, for its strawberries fields, and Cáceres, for its tobacco fields. Leon's mining industry also attracts immigrants, particularly those from Africa and Eastern Europe (Morén-Alegret & Solana 2004).

Map 1. Residence permit-holding foreigners in Spain according to province, 31 December 2006

Source: Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs / Statistical Yearbook of Immigration 2006

3. Legal framework and the evolution of migration and integration policies

From a legal perspective, the evolution of Spanish immigration and integration policies can be divided into three different phases, each corresponding to major legislative events. Running from the mid-1980s until the early 1990s, the initial period produced a first generation of laws on immigration, including the first Foreigners Law. Covering most of the 1990s, the second phase witnessed the birth of the next generation of immigration laws and the simultaneous adoption of the first policies on immigrant social integration. Finally, 1999 onwards marks a third phase that has brought about significant changes to the Foreigners Law, as well as ushered in a new turn in integration policies.

Taking chronological stock of policies on immigration and integration within a three-generational framework allows us to contextualise them within different historical and political moments. However, grouping policies in phases for the sake of theoretical comparison does not deny the continuity that runs throughout the core of the legal system, particularly in immigration policies. Although political majorities of every era have inspired either more progressive or more conservative tendencies, the main guiding principles of immigration legislation have remained pretty near to those promulgated by first regulations. The number of regulations and the sheer volume of the main legal texts have increased though. Such substantial continuity cannot be presumed, however, in the field of integration policies. These emerged only in what we above defined as the second phase of national policies, and they changed significantly in later phases. Thus, the first general trend to be noted is that immigration policies in which central state institutions are the exclusive actors show much more continuity than integration policies whose design and development is influenced by many more actors and stakeholders at different levels of society.

To reiterate, Spain had primarily been an emigration country and only in the mid-1980s did its reversal of migration patterns became visible. In 1986, the number of Spanish returnees from abroad was for the first time higher than the number of Spanish emigrants. In that same year, the number of foreign immigrants was still growing, though it remained low, at a level just below 300,000 (Watts 1998: 658, 661). It was during the year before, in 1985, that the first Foreigners Law⁴ was passed in Spain. The way these events played out indicates that Spain's full incorporation into the European Communities (in 1986) was a more important factor for the introduction of the law than were any immigration statistics.

Although the main aim of this first substantial regulation was to build a framework for legal support and to specify conditions of stay for foreigners in Spain, it also introduced opportunities to restrict entrance. Moreover, granting residence permits on a one-year basis encouraged the notion of temporariness to predominate policies. In view of the earlier absence of a comprehensive immigration and integration policy at Spain's central level, this law was a relative novelty. This marked the birth of the first generation of legislation.

The 1985 Foreigners Law, however, was not the first regulation to be born to this generation. In fact, it was preceded by other related pieces of legislation that were developed in unison and had a bearing on Spain's inclusion in the European Community. Thus, the Law on Asylum⁵ was passed in 1984 and its implementing regulation⁶ in 1985. The Foreigners Law would also be developed through the corresponding developing regulation in 1986.⁷ In addition, the Royal Decree of 1986⁸ regulated the situation of European Economic Community state citizens (a 'European' citizenship, per se, did not exist at that time). To get a complete view on the legal framework of immigration policies, two important Constitutional Court rules must be cited. The first is judgement number 107/1984.⁹ This ruling, issued prior to the approval of the Foreigners Law, had already clarified the basic rights that would or would not be enjoyed by foreigners, according to the new constitutional system. As such, the Constitutional Court established three different

⁴ Ley 7/1985, Orgánica de Derechos y Libertades de los Extranjeros en España (Organic Law of Rights and Freedoms of Foreigners in Spain) of 1 July 1985.

⁵ Ley 5/1984, Reguladora del Derecho de Asilo y de la Condición de Refugiado (Law Regulating the Right to Asylum and the Condition of the Refugee) of 26 March 1984.

⁶ Reglamentos de desarrollo. A regulation is a form of secondary legislation which is used to implement a primary piece of legislation appropriately.

⁷ Royal Decree 19 November 1986.

⁸ Real Decreto 766/1986, Sobre Entrada y Permanencia en España de Nacionales de Estados Miembros de las Comunidades Europeas (Royal Decree on Entry and Residence of Citizens of the Member States of the European Communities) of 26 June 1986.

⁹ Judgment of the Constitutional Court of 23 November 1984.

groups of rights, with the recognition that foreigners could be entitled to enjoy two of them, under different conditions.

According to the court, a first set of fundamental rights had to be equally recognised for everybody, including foreigners regardless of their legal situation in the country. These included basic rights such as the right to life, freedom of expression and judicial guarantees, among others. By contrast, most so-called political rights (the right to vote or to participate directly in public affairs and responsibilities) were not applicable to foreigners. Article 13.2 of Spain's Constitution prohibits such possibilities (the only exception being the right to vote in local elections if there is a reciprocity agreement with a foreign resident's home country). The remaining rights recognised in Title I of the Spanish Constitution may be extended to foreigners depending on their legal situation in Spain, and according to what has been established in the Foreigners Law. This conditionality also applies to differences in how legislation can regulate the concrete implementation of these rights in the cases of foreign inhabitants. This early Constitutional Court ruling of 1984 would later have an obvious influence on the drafting of the aforementioned legislation. The second important Constitutional Court judgement is classified as number 115/1987.¹⁰ This judgement was provoked by the national ombudsman, finding that some articles of the 1985 Foreigners Law, such as those regarding the right to form associations and the right to demonstrate,¹¹ did not conform with the 1978 Spanish Constitution. The Constitutional Court ruled partially in favour of the ombudsman's position and, as a result, some specific paragraphs of the law were declared void.

As for Spanish nationality law, many of the country's constitutions included the basic regulations of naturalisation during the 19th century. From the 20th century up until the present-day, however, the main bulk of this legislation has been incorporated into the civil code. Reflecting the legacy of emigration tradition in Spanish society, the criterion for nationality assignation is more an ius sanguinis model than an ius soli one. Moreover, in Spanish legal tradition, the terms 'nationality' and 'citizenship' are mostly synonymous. According to the regulation in force, foreigners can acquire Spanish nationality by residing legally in the country for a continuous period of ten years. This being a general rule, some exceptions are also accommodated. For example, only a two-year legal residence is required to acquire Spanish nationality by nationals from Brazil, Andorra, Portugal and former Spanish colonies (apart from the Western Sahara and Morocco), as well as descendents of Spanish Sephardic Jews. A significant number of immigrants who arrived in Spain within the last ten to fifteen years have become Spanish nationals; those of Latin American origin are among the highest-ranking numbers. This practice works to minimise the total number of foreigners reflected in the statistics. Many immigrants see naturalisation as the definitive solution to their legal situation and, as it stands now, there have been no major changes to the legal framework for naturalisation.¹²

¹⁰ Judgment of the Constitutional Court of 7 July 1987.

¹¹ Although there was no general prohibition, the exertion of these rights by foreigners needed prior authorisation by public authorities. This provoked a de facto limitation on the right of association as well as the right to meet.

¹² The main modification took place in 2002, having been approved to protect the interests of descendents of former generations of Spanish emigrants. Its aim was to more easily secure the opportunity for such individuals to obtain or recuperate their Spanish nationality, though it did not,

As a whole, this bundle of first-generation legislation puts clear-cut emphasis on the control of immigration flows and the regulation of formal requirements for foreigners to enter and stay in Spain. After 1985, most foreigners were obliged to conform to new, concrete legal stipulations, and the illegal presence of immigrants became a reality. Beyond this general rule, both European Community citizens and asylum seekers enjoyed a privileged status provided for in specific pieces of legislation. The privileges of asylum provoked a flow of applications from certain groups of immigrants. However, within a few years, the restrictive interpretation of the asylum regulations followed by national authorities curbed this tendency.

A significant shift in migration policies can be identified around 1990. On 26 June, the United Left (IU)¹³ parliamentary group submitted a motion to the Congress of Deputies asking for regularisation of those undocumented foreigners who had resided and worked in Spain for some period of time. This motion pleaded the right for families to reunite and requested preparation of a draft immigration bill to help realise the right. It also urged the government to prepare a report on the situation of foreign immigrants in Spain. The ensuing political discussion thus introduced significant elements of integration policies into the discussion. In office at the time, the Socialist Party (PSOE)¹⁴ responded by conveying a communication to Parliament regarding the situation of foreigners and supplying basic policy guidelines. On 13 March 1991, almost all parliamentary groups agreed on a resolution urging the government to organise a regularisation process and to adopt more legislative and/or administrative integration measures that would complement the existing framework. The consequence of this resolution was an extraordinary regularisation procedure, which was instated the following summer. With enthusiastic collaboration by most relevant social actors, the government received approximately 120,000 applications of undocumented immigrants. Most of these applications led to residence permits.

After the EU treaty entered into force in 1994 the Law on Asylum was substantially modified¹⁵ and, in 1995, its implementing regulation was also adapted to the new demands of European inter-governmental agreements in the field.¹⁶ A restrictive view of asylum was thus instated and, since then, foreign immigrants have hardly used asylum to enter Spain. This wave of changes did not alter the 1985 Foreigners Law, though it did significantly change its developing regulation, which was derogated and substituted by a new text in 1996.¹⁷ Following the main concerns expressed in previous years in both Parliament and in the public debate, the new 1996 Royal Decree focused on the social integration of immigrants. This meant it included more specific regulations about family reunification procedures, unaccompanied minor immigrants and some basic social rights. Furthermore, the new developing regulation permitted another regularisation process for undocumented foreigners.

All such changes, however, were still part of a legislation that basically aimed at immigration control and management. And the introduction of an annual in effect, affect the situation of foreign immigrants. A number of minor amendments in the same direction have taken place, for instance, in 1995.

¹³ Izquierda Unida.

¹⁴ Partido Socialista Obrero Español.

¹⁵ Law 9/1994 of 19 May 1994.

¹⁶ Royal Decree 203/1995 of 10 February 1995.

¹⁷ Royal Decree 155/1996 of 2 February 1996.

quota or contingent system from 1993 onwards testifies to this. In practice, however, a very specific relation developed in this period between regularisations, on the one hand, and the annual quota, on the other; the regularisations seemed to fill the largest part of the quota.

What did change in this period was the very fact that integration had arisen as an issue in legislation and policy. Apart from the social aspects that were introduced in 1996's new developing regulation of the Foreigners Law, mentioned above, three major steps were taken in this respect. First, the central government started to look at immigration as more than a mere trans-border flow. As such, integration policies were for the first time considered and, in 1994, a national strategy was drafted. This was known as the Plan on Social Integration of Immigrants. With the benefit of hindsight, the document can hardly be considered influential; however, it was still an important hallmark of the new field of integration policy. Parallel to this plan, two instruments were created to assist the development of social integration policies: the Forum on the Social Integration of Immigrants,¹⁸ (from herein simply referred to as the Forum) and the Permanent Observatory on Immigration (OPI).¹⁹ The Forum²⁰ is the supreme government's consulting body on immigration and integration policies. It comprises representatives of the public sector and social organisations involved in the field, as well as immigrant associations. Although, in the beginning, the Forum lacked support from the ministries, besides those of Labour and Social Affairs, its position was subsequently consolidated to ensure participation by all relevant ministries and institutions in its functioning. OPI was developed as a tool to monitor immigration and integration and, on the basis of such analysis, suggest policies.

The introduction of integration policies in this period added to the complexity of relations between the different levels of governance in Spain. Immigration policies remained the exclusive competence of the central institutions. This decision was made in accordance with Article 149.1.2 of the 1978 Spanish Constitution, which stated that all legislative and executive powers related to immigration, asylum, nationality, passports, borders and aliens are the sole responsibility of the national parliament and government. On the flipside, the system generated by the autonomous communities established a distribution of responsibilities in which the regional governments were responsible for all key policy vis-à-vis the accommodation of immigrants.²¹ This came as the result of transferring responsibilities from central to regional administrations.²² Thus, autonomous communities and municipalities had begun endeavouring to manage immigrant integration through their policies in matters such as social welfare, education, health and housing. Later on, they began to formulate 'immigration plans', referring mainly to certain aspects of integration. As section 5 shows, in various places such bottom-up initiatives had various contents and forms.

The third phase in the development of legislative initiatives dealing with immigration started in 1999. The beginning of this period was marked by political ¹⁸ Foro para la Integración Social de los Inmigrantes.

¹⁹ Observatorio Permanente de la Inmigración.

²⁰ The Forum's current status is regulated in Royal Decree 367/2001 of 4 April 2001.

²¹ The national policies for integration (GRECO (2000) and PECI (2006)) have institutionalised a de facto distribution of tasks.

²² Some of these responsibilities are shared with the local administrations.

turmoil and changes in government. What emerged was a long social debate and resounding consensus among political parties that the 1985 Foreigners Law needed be adapted in view of Spain's increasing rate of immigration. A second Foreigners Law, passed by Spanish Parliament at the end of 1999,²³ was seen by many as a positive turning point. Although it did not contain very substantial modifications, it intended to change how the quota functioned in order to effect its instrumentation for labour market policy and new entry, rather than regularisations. From the social perspective, the new law recognised a significant number of immigrant rights, including clear provisions favouring individuals in an illegal situation. Thus, basic social aspects such as access to education, public health, social benefits and assistance were guaranteed to all those foreigners residing de facto in any municipality. Furthermore, legal residents enjoyed a substantial number of additional rights. This second Foreigners Law entered into force in 2000.

Nevertheless, the political consensus on this new law was not shared by the conservative People's Party (PP).²⁴ The PP argued that this new legislation provided few possibilities to fight undocumented immigration to Spain and conceded too many rights to undocumented foreigners. Thus, after the PP had won the national 2000 elections in an absolute majority and again came into power,²⁵ its recently elected conservative government showed no intention of drafting the developing regulation of the new 1999 law. In fact, it came with a significantly modified law that was accepted with the help of the PP's overwhelming majority in December 2000.²⁶ This new law took three divergent directions. Firstly, legal provisions became more restrictive, and many fundamental rights were denied for immigrants without a residence permit. Granting resident permits to undocumented immigrants already residing in Spain was strongly restricted. Secondly, the whole regime of issuing sanctions against undocumented foreigners, or people collaborating with them, became much harsher both on paper and in procedure. Finally, the discretionary competence given to the government to develop the law's actual content was enormously expanded. On this basis, the government proceeded to pass an extensive reform of the developing regulation in 2001.²⁷

In 2000, the government approved a plan for integrating foreign immigrants called the Global Programme of Regulation and Coordination of Immigration in Spain (GRECO).²⁸ This plan was primarily aligned with the restrictive policy reflected in the PP's Law of 2000. Having been based largely on the conception of temporary migration, it thus strongly emphasised return.

Legislative reforms on immigration under the conservative government continued with November 2003's approval of a new set of modifications to the Foreigners Law.²⁹ The new set contained concrete rules on sanctions, extended the scope of visa requirements and regulated – and widened – the opportunity to detain undocumented foreigners in specific centres. Both the legal reform of

²³ Law 4/2000 of 11 January 2000.

²⁴ Partido Popular.

²⁵ From 1996 to 2000, the PP was in power with just a relative majority.

²⁶ Law 8/2000 of 22 December 2000.

²⁷ Royal Decree 864/2001 of 20 July 2001.

²⁸ Programa Global de Regulación y Coordinación de la Inmigración en España. Its application spanned the period 2000-2004.

²⁹ Law 14/2003 of 20 November 2003.

December 2000 and the November 2003 Foreigners Law were challenged before the Constitutional Court for possible violations of fundamental immigrant rights. These appeals were instigated by declarations adopted by the Basque Parliament, and then followed by some other regional parliaments. While the second appeal against the November 2003 Foreigners Law is still pending, in November 2007, the Constitutional Court decided that some of the legal reform of December 2000 articles did indeed violate the fundamental rights of foreigners.³⁰

The general elections of 2004 ushered in a leftwing parliamentary majority, a PSOE government and, in general, a new climate and a different configuration of actors in the field. A new developing regulation of the Foreigners Law was adopted in December 2004.³¹

The above-mentioned regional appeals bring to bare something that was less visible in the earlier Spanish legislative periods. Coming into focus in the third period was the insistence of regional authorities to influence policies at the national level. On the one hand, these initiatives expressed resistance by some autonomous communities against the restrictive policy implemented by the central government, especially during the years of the PP government (1996-2004). On the other hand, on the basis of their own policy initiatives in the field of integration within various regions (Catalonia, Valencia, Andalusia, Madrid, Navarra and the Basque Country), Catalonia and other regions claimed more executive powers. But it took until 2006, upon approval of a new version of Catalonia's statute of autonomy, to admit the formal participation of the autonomous community in the immigration process. The Catalanian track was subsequently followed by the amended Statute of Andalusia. Still, it should be noted, other autonomous communities have shown much less interest in sharing these powers with the state when amending their statutes (Santolaya 2007).

Since 2001, Spain has had a Higher Council on Immigration Policy.³² This body coordinates policies of the central and regional administrations, though its role has, so far, been only exercised to a limit.

Immigration and integration policies in Spain thus follow relatively divergent ways. The competences of national, regional and local authorities are different, as are the ranges of actors involved and the subsequent development of policies over time. For this reason, it is productive to separately analyse the policies and their respective developments. In distinct sections below, we will nonetheless endeavour to indicate where the policy fields may touch and influence each other.

4. Immigration policies and policymaking

As stated above, the first generation of regulations dealing with immigration came about in the mid-1980s. Their emergence had more to do with Spain's imminent accession to the European Community than with the issue of immigration itself, which was at that time still at a low level. Basically, these laws and regulations introduced much of the instrumentation for regulation and control that was earlier developed in European Community countries in order to satisfy the European bodies. The background and timing of the immigration policy's institutionalisation explain how the first Foreigners Law (1985) was passed without amendment and with virtual unanimity. These factors also explain why there was hardly any involvement of social, civic or economic actors in the drafting of these immigration regulations, nor any significant reaction at the local or regional levels. In terms of policy effects, the Europeanisation of the first generation of migration regulations produced a permanent conflict between an externally induced restrictive policy and the economic situation in Spain, which was characterised in the 1990s and 2000s by an increasing demand for unskilled labour (Moreno Fuentes 2005: 110).

³⁰ Judgment of the Constitutional Court of 7 November 2007.

³¹ Royal Decree 2393/2004 of 30 December 2004.

³² Consejo Superior de Política de Inmigración.

Despite many changes in the law (in 1985 and made twice in 2000) and the development of subsequent regulations (in 1991, 1996, 2001, 2003, 2004), Spain has never resolved the mismatch between its very restrictive entry policies and simultaneous labour demands. This has resulted in the emergence of an irregular immigration model (Izquierdo 2001) and the implementation of frequent regularisation measures endeavouring to surface the ever-growing stocks of irregular migrants. Moreover, very short-term residence permits and the fact that their prolongation is contingent on a formal work contract have led many regularised immigrants to fall back into irregularity.

A crucial question that must be answered to understand the significance of immigration regulations and, particularly, their frequent changes is how these regulations have actually worked. To this end, we will focus not only on the formulation of measures, but specifically on their implementation and effects. Inasmuch as immigration policies remain the exclusive competence of the central government, analysing the formulation and implementation of entry and regularisation policies enables us to introduce two important nuances. First of all, in contrast to entry policies, regularisation programmes – which, in practice, have been the primary avenue for conferring legal status – have come as the result of bottom-up pressures exerted in great measure by social actors as well as by regional and local governments. In this regard, as we will see in the following section, their policymaking more closely resembles that of integration policies. Secondly, in terms of implementation, we have observed increasing participation, ever since 2000, by social actors (particularly employer organisations and trade unions), and a gradual decentralisation of administrative functions to regional and local governments. In the following paragraphs, we will separately analyse these two key elements of immigration policies.

Entry

The Foreigners Law of 1985 (in force until 2000) maintained the previous policy's practice of submitting each labour migrant entry to administrative control. Employment of non-EU workers was only permitted if employers could demonstrate that they were unable to hire any otherwise suitable citizen or resident of the country. In terms of policymaking, this implied that the evaluation of labour needs was administrative rather than political. Since this evaluation was undertaken by local public employment offices, permission for the employment of foreign workers depended on discretionary interpretations and practices of labour market tests. The absence of a political decision further implied that there was no judicial control on the implementation of entry policies. In terms of policy implementation and effects, this work permit policy (referred to as the general regime) obstructed legal entry in the following ways: 1) labour market tests were often conducted in a very restrictive manner; 2) there were no clear, objective criteria for admission, which meant employers were faced with excessive uncertainty when it came time to hire; 3) there were insufficient mechanisms to match labour demand with supply; 4) and even when work permit applications were approved, it took months before securing the actual document.

In order to create new avenues for legal entry, in 1993, the Spanish government launched a quota system. The idea behind this second work permit system was to create a direct way to enter regularly into Spain without submitting individual applications to a test of the labour market. This was only possible in particular economic sectors that were determined annually by the government, and for a maximum number of applications. In contrast to the general regime, the quota system thus introduced a political evaluation of labour needs. However, in practice, this system functioned as a regularisation programme, as most applications were filed by irregular migrants already in the country. Once applications were approved, foreign workers went back to their country of origin (or to a Spanish consulate in Southern France), applied for a visa and then re-entered into Spain as regular migrants. In contrast to a regularisation programme proper, prior residence was not needed, economic sectors were determined by the state and there was a limited number of annual applications.

From 2000 to 2004, the rightwing government closed off the possibility of entry through the general regime. Although several court judgements deemed this illegal, therefore letting entry remain formally open, in practice, the general regime was no longer an option, as labour market tests were done in a very restrictive manner. In these four years, the government endeavoured to channel regular migration exclusively through the quota system. For this purpose, the quota system was modified in two different ways. First, in order to avoid the regularisation of irregular migrants through the quota system, job offers could only be made through anonymous recruitment. By signing bilateral agreements with countries such as Colombia, Morocco, Poland, Ecuador, the Dominican Republic and Romania, the selection process became the responsibility of the individual countries' governments. Second, to adapt the annual quota to the requirements of the labour market, included in the process were regional governments, employer organisations and trade unions who could help determine the number and characteristics of workers included under this system. In this system, employer organisations' and trade unions' estimations were evaluated at the provincial level by regional governments and then proposed for acceptance to the Ministry of Labour. In turn, the Ministry was responsible for the final decision after consultation with the Higher Council on Immigration Policy.

At this point, it is important to note that the inclusion of regional governments in defining the annual quota indicated recognition of their role in the immigration policymaking process. In practice, however, regional governments had only rather limited influence. In many cases, regional governments chose for a zero quota or a very limited one at that (Catalonia was an exception), thereby requiring the central government to re-evaluate its estimations (Roig Molés 2007: 292). By contrast, employer organisations and trade unions took on a fundamental role. While trade unions took rather restrictive positions, employer organisations defended higher quotas. However, annual quotas have been rather low. To explain this outcome, Roig Molés refers to the fact that many Spanish employers do not follow in a tradition of accounting for their future labour needs. Moreover, in many provinces, employer organisations do not represent the medium and small companies that have the highest demands for foreign workers (ibid.).

Although proffered by subsequent governments as Spain's main channel for legal entry, the quota system has offered no more than 20,000 to 40,000 jobs per year. While the annual quota had always been rather limited, the number of employer applications registered through this system has further decreased. The outcomes may be explained by the rigidities imposed by the annual quota (as established by economic sector, job speciality and province), the limitations of the recruitment process (managed by the governments of countries of origin), and once again, excessively long administrative procedures.

Given the limitations of the quota system, in 2004, with the PSOE again in power, the general regime was restored. The idea behind this decision was that those employers who wanted to hire a foreign worker in particular or who had not anticipated their labour needs in time to be accounted for in the quota system, would still have the opportunity to undertake nominative employment of foreign workers. From this point onwards, in order to facilitate procedures in those sectors with huge staff shortages, the Spanish government has issued a quarterly list of occupations in which nominative employment of foreign workers is permitted without first having to conduct a labour market test. The national employment office disseminates this list to the regional governments, where it is discussed at the regional level with employer organisations and trade unions. Ultimately, the list is approved in the Tripartite Labour Commission, which features representation by the Ministry of Labour, Spain's largest employer organisation (CEOE) and the two largest trade unions (CCOO, UGT).

After more than twenty years of entry policies in Spain, policymaking has undergone its own distinct development. Parallel to the gradual deployment of a more comprehensive set of policies, there has been a shift from a policy based on discretionary, administrative evaluations of labour needs to a policy based on political decision-making. In the first phase, such decisions were made by the Spanish government alone and, from 2000 onwards, by the Spanish government along with regional governments, employer organisations and trade unions. Our first analysis of the attitudes of the different partners involved reveals that regional governments have not always been in favour of open-entry policies. Secondly, while employer organisations have commonly claimed less restrictive policies, their position has varied according to region and depending on whether medium and small companies were represented. Finally, trade unions have often been reluctant to an open-labour migration policy. While they have pushed for the legalisation of irregular migrants who are already present in the country, trade unions have had a much more restrictive position regarding the entrance of new migrants.

Regularisation

In view of how entrance has actually been regulated, it is no wonder that regularisations have constituted the primary avenue for conferring legal status in Spain. Concretely speaking, the easiest and most common way to obtain a legal status had been to enter with a tourist visa, work illegally for a while and then get regularised in one of the frequent regularisation programmes. Between 1985 and 2005, six exceptional regularisation processes were implemented in Spain (1986, 1991, 1996, 2000, 2001, 2005).³³ Moreover, the general regime and, in particular, the quota system have actually functioned as regularisation programmes. Since 2004, individual regularisation (referred to as ‘arraigo’ – ‘rooting’ in English) has been possible once the migrant has lived in Spain for two years and has established a work relationship of at least one year (or three years and the prospect of entering into a work contract).

The Spanish government has given different reasons for implementing extraordinary regularisation programmes. For one, the government launched different regularisation programmes to reduce the stocks of irregular migrants that had been generated through previous procedures before introducing a new immigration law or regulation (1986, 1996, 2000, 2005). Regularisation programmes also emerged in reaction to pressure by migrants and their supporters (e.g. protests in churches in 2001 and 2002). Moreover, the manifestation of particular events, as selected and amplified by the media, spurred on regularisation programmes. These events often called attention to the precariousness of life for irregular migrants, such as a traffic accident with Ecuadorian workers in 2001.³⁴ In 1991 a regularisation programme was implemented in exchange for the introduction of a visa requirement for Moroccans. Finally, the government has also argued, most remarkably in 2005, that regularisation programmes were necessary in order to reduce the underground economy and therefore benefit both the migrant (by improving their working and living conditions) and Spanish society (through more taxes and social security contributions).

Most regularisations required conditions of residency and work to be fulfilled. While residence was normally demonstrated through registration in the municipality (known as Padrón Municipal de Habitantes), in 2000 and 2001, passport entry stamps, boarding tickets, utility bills and other similar documents could also be used for this purpose. In 2005, following a number of demonstrations in Barcelona and Madrid, seven other documents (e.g. official health cards, expulsion orders, rejected registration applications, asylum applications) were also deemed applicable for registration ‘by omission’. Labour requirements had also been instated through some regularisation programmes

³³ The 1990s also saw specific regularisation programmes implemented to solve confrontational situations in the border cities of Ceuta and Melilla. These programmes permitted irregular migrants to get a one-year residence permit without having to undergo the standard process. In exchange, the government required active collaboration from NGOs who would see to it that immigrants could move to the peninsula. There they were to be granted some basic reception provisions, a gesture meant to counterbalance the negative impact of their irregular arrival.

³⁴ On 3 January 2001 in the Murcian city of Lorca, twelve Ecuadorian migrants on their way to work were killed when their van was hit by a train. Widely covered by regional and national media, the event brought attention to the workers’ living and labour conditions, thus publicising the precarious situation of many migrants in Spain.

(1986, 2000, 2005), which, in practice, meant that only workers in the formal economy got regularised. Particularly in the regularisation of 2005, eligibility was dependent on the prospect of a bona fide work contract of at least six months. Finally, in 1996, a special programme was launched to regularise those migrants who had fallen back into irregularity. In this case, potential regularised migrants had to prove that they had been in possession of an earlier residence or work permit.

Although making immigration policies has always been the sole competence of the national authorities, regularisations may to a great extent be considered the product of bottom-up pressures. Concerned by the difficult situation of many irregular immigrants living in Spain, numerous NGOs, trade unions and other social activists have compelled governments to enforce such regularisations by, for example, exerting political pressure in Parliament. The underlying motivation for such petitions was to promote amnesty in the name of justice, but their effects were not always well considered nor was there always consensus on the ultimate goals at stake. In this regard, regularisations have often divided social movements. Depending on their expectations, immigrants themselves have cultivated a range of stances, from more moderate, collaboratively oriented positions to the more oppositional and radically defined. Meanwhile, in the minds of other social actors, regularisation is an issue with negative consequences, namely, diverting a significant amount of effort away from long-term strategies to immigration and integration policies.

Employers have generally taken a favourable position vis-à-vis regularisation processes. Among smaller companies, especially, employers were grateful for the opportunity to regularise the situation of many of their already employed irregular immigrants. Following the trend throughout Europe, Spanish trade unions have expressed worry about the possible negative impact immigrant workers might have on wages and employment opportunities for native workers, but they – much more than other actors – have demonstrated a positive attitude towards immigration and immigrants (Watts 1998; Calavita 2003; Cachon & Valles 2003). Trade unions have extended their services to immigrant workers, basically regarding them as potential new members through which they can reinforce their social presence. This stance may have something to do with the fact that Spain's dominant trade unions have traditionally had a left-wing political orientation. At the same time, it is also plausible that the remarkable expansion of the Spanish economy during the last decade and the importance of the country's black economy have encouraged the positive attitude among trade unions.

Finally, although some autonomous communities and municipalities have asked the central government to examine the prospect of opening regularisation processes, the role of regional and local authorities has been modest. Any participation on their part has mainly been motivated by the development of specific programmes for the social integration of immigrants, or as a result of pressure by social movements. Finally, since 2000, autonomous communities have been key actors in the implementation of regularisation programmes. While the gradual decentralisation of regularisation programmes increased the state's administrative response capacity, it also introduced important regional differences in the evaluation of applications (Ramos Gallarín & Bazaga Fernández 2002).

5. Integration policies and policymaking

Telling the diffuse story of integration policymaking in Spain and the consequent involvement of different actors presents more challenges than describing immigration's well centralised policies. Giving due attention to the various dimensions at stake in this analysis, we will first make some general remarks on the policymaking process and then outline its mechanisms on three levels: the national; the local and regional; and from the perspective of non-governmental actors involved in both national and local policies.

As already discussed, up until to 2004, policymaking efforts at the national level primarily focused on the immigration field. The elaboration of integration policies mostly occurred on the regional and local levels for three reasons. Firstly, until 2004, Spain's management of migration in many ways resembled the guest-worker policies of Northern European states during the 1960s. Specifically, this means that a labour approach prevailed and the state's main preoccupation was immigration control and regulation, thereby relegating integration to take second place. At the national level, policymaking in formal governmental and parliamentary arenas had basically taken shape in negotiations of the Foreigners Law.

Secondly, the sub-national level became the locus of integration policymaking as a consequence of the division of tasks between levels that the system of autonomous communities established. As we described in section 3, while the national government manages immigration, sub-national governments have the competence for promoting the accommodation of immigrants: regional and local governments are responsible for the policy measures involved in integration (health care, education, social assistance, labour and housing).³⁵ The national policies for integration (GRECO (2000) and PEGI (2006)) would later institutionalise the de facto distribution of responsibilities between territorial tiers. This division of work no doubt had consequences for policymaking, namely, the difficult coordination between administrations and the heterogeneity of policies and processes.

More than anything else, this distribution of tasks in the elaboration of policies implies extreme separation between the policy fields of immigration and integration, and their respective networks and policymaking logics (Tamayo & Carrillo 2002). The two separate spheres follow divergent logics: the national government endeavours to restrict the entrance of migrants, while the autonomous communities and municipalities seek to make irregular migrants visible so as to develop policies that improve their living situation. Although the policy areas operate separately from one other, developments in the sphere of integration are hierarchically determined by those in migration. This helps explain how the three national plans for integration developed.

In section 3, we explained how the two policy domains have gradually become linked since the 1990s. Parliamentary debates over the Foreigners Law have, more and more, come to deal with the negative ramifications it had for the integration of migrants in society. In such debates, the 'integration of migrants' would become an ideological position in and of itself, eventually coming to oppose restrictive positions on migration (Moreno Fuentes 2004). This stance is harnessed by the view that integration policies are ‘the protection of human rights’ or ‘the defence of equal opportunities’, beliefs that have been promoted largely by social organisations.

³⁵ Some of these responsibilities are shared with the local administrations.

Thirdly, integration policymaking in Spain has shifted out of the political arena and downwards to the sub-national levels. One important explanation for this shift is that Spanish political elites at the national level have tended towards a more conflictive negotiation style, while at the same time becoming more dependent on such negotiations between political forces (Goma & Subirats 1998; Gallego, Goma & Subirats 2003). This tendency has been propelled ever since the polarisation of Spain’s two major political parties in 2004, leading up to the present-day’s political climate marked by division and great hostility. As such, policymaking at Spain’s national level is complicated. When it comes to integration issues, the political agenda has become narrower in scope, while simultaneously undergoing shifts downwards, to the regional level, and outwards, to the administrative sphere.³⁶

National developments

Although the principal activities of integration policymaking transpire at sub-national levels, the national level has witnessed three benchmarks in policymaking: the Plan of Social Integration of Migrants (1994), GRECO (2000) and PEGI (2006). These national policy initiatives have been triggered by bottom-up pressure exerted by sub-national public administrations (i.e. regions and municipalities) and civil society organisations. A significant amount of emulation has also taken place whereby policy concepts and models are patterned after the regional and local levels.

As demonstrated in section 3, the first generation of legislative initiatives in the 1980s dealt almost exclusively with the regulation of immigration itself, something that had been foremost defined as a temporary phenomenon. Spain’s main motive for developing these initiatives was to secure imminent access to the EEC, as opposed to any urgency, per se, of migration developments in the country. This explains the relative absence of societal actors in the process of creating these first-generation laws and regulations. Within such a framework, developing policy measures to facilitate immigrant settlement and the process of becoming a multicultural society could not take political priority.³⁷ This situation, however, changed during the 1990s when more and more actors in Spanish society, particularly at the regional and the local levels, came to face the consequences of a steadily growing immigrant population as well as the specific implications that the practice of immigration regulation had (as described in section 4). Already by the very start of the decade, societal action and political mobilisation pressed for changes in immigration regulation that would create a better basis for integration at the local level (regularisations, rights for family reunification and for minors). This did indeed lead to a number of changes in the mid-1990s, and it also put pressure on the government to create an explicit integration policy. A crucial event was the signing of the Declaration of Girona by a number of civil society organisations in 1992. This document backed the statement that public administrations should develop a comprehensive integration policy, beyond a mere contention of problems. It also acknowledged the need for giving specialised attention to immigrants.

³⁶ The confrontation between the party in power (the moderate social democratic PSOE) and the opposition’s main party (the conservative PP) has compelled the government to minimise the number of issues on the political agenda. As an energy-saving strategy, points of conflict thus become very focused, while many other issues get delegated to bureaucrats so as to reduce overall political confrontation.

³⁷ This is also reflected in research: studies dealing with the elaboration processes of integration policy are rather scarce (Tamayo & Carrillo 2002; Zapata 2002c, 2003; Ramos et al. 1998), while studies dealing with immigration policy are more common (Tamayo & Delgado 1998; Carrillo & Delgado 1998; Ramos & Bazaga 2002; Goma & Subirats 1996; Lopez Sala 2005). Few studies deal with both policy fields (Casey 1998; Agrela Romero & Gil Araujo 2005).

This societal insistence produced the first national Plan on Social Integration of Immigrants, launched in 1994 by the Ministry of Social Affairs. Despite being a response to pressure from the grass-roots level, the plan was produced in Spain's administrative arena without any political or social debate. Furthermore, several authors suggest that this plan was inspired by – if not patterned upon – the 1993 Catalan Plan (Cais 2004; Zapata 2002). Coming after Catalonia's, the national plan showed striking similarities to the former plan in its institutional structure, particularly in terms of instruments promoting interdepartmental cooperation and social participation (e.g. the Forum³⁸).

In the formal sense, Spain's integration policies were introduced at the national level, a novel development. But, in practice, the importance of the 1994 plan was something more symbolic, acknowledging for the first time that 'integration' was a policy goal (Pajares 2004). The plan, however, led to meagre results, which were not only due to the scarcity of resources allocated, but also coordination difficulties among the multiplicities of institutions involved.³⁹ As an evaluation of the Ministry of Labour and Social Issues (IMSERSO 1998) concluded, Spain's first attempt to promote its integration of immigrants was little more than a rhetorical effort; there were mismatches between the plan's intended goals and the economic, administrative and human resources actually available. Moreover, the various institutions involved held contradictory views on the issue. The clashing views of the Ministry of Interior Affairs, the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs are a case in point (Gil Araujo 2002).

The new national regulation known as the GRECO plan was launched in the year 2000. Once again, the plan was designed by civil servants behind closed doors in the Ministry of Interior. It did not establish concrete measures or guidelines for sub-national actors, and neither was it backed by any specific allocation of financial resources (Pajares 2004). GRECO emerged in an extremely thorny historical context marked by the progressive Foreigners Law 4/2000's reformation into its restrictive 8/2000 version, 2001's regularisation process, national and regional elections and several mobilisations among citizens, from both pro-migrant and anti-migrant sides. Transferring the immigration portfolio to the Ministry of Interior was another sign of the paradigm shift brought about by the PP government. Integration was not their first priority, and this was reflected not only in the policy's two main rationales⁴⁰ – but also in the actual expenses reflected in the annual reports (Delegación de Gobierno para la Extranjería y la Inmigración 2002).⁴¹ It is not farfetched to conclude thus that, in this case, integration was a political goal to the extent that it contributed to the return of immigrants to their home countries. And, moreover, it helped maintain the status quo of a restrictive immigration policy.

³⁸ Although in 1995, the Forum merely functioned as a means for its participants to exchange information and opinions, in 1998, its tasks grew to include advising on all policies that had implications on the integration of immigrants (Aja & Diaz Bueso 1999). The Forum gathers representatives from the central and regional governments, immigrant organizations, trade unions, and NGOs.

³⁹ Besides the various ministries involved, the central state also made covenants with the regions. In view of the rising immigrant presence, regional covenants were meant to provide support for developing specific measures such as the reception of minors, juridical assistance and registering migrants as residents in their municipalities.

Finally, 2004 saw production of the first real national framework policy for the promotion of integration. Increasing social pressures and the topic's gradual politicisation upped integration policy on a national political agenda being developed by the new social democratic government. Promoting equality of immigrants was the main goal of the ambitious national Programme for the Citizenship and Integration, known as PEGI 2006. For the first time, these national guidelines were backed by the financial commitment of an allotted budget (2,005 million euros were set for the period 2007-2010). The funding was to be proportionately distributed among the regions according to their immigrant population percentages as well as among the municipalities, for the first time thus recognising the important role of local authorities. In addition, the national integration budget sanctioned those regional policies that complied with national guidelines, although autonomous communities could still cultivate their own integration policy.

There are notable differences in these consecutive national plans and the actors who subsequently participated in their elaborations. While all three plans share a technocratic policymaking style that lacks much parliamentary discussion between parties, PEGI stands out for having a relatively pro-participation nature. PEGI was drafted by independently operating specialists who had also considered recommendations produced by several expert seminars. And although discussions with regional and local levels did not take place during its drafting, the plan was also subject to widespread consultation and commentary.

Regional and local developments

The above description of the development of integration policies at the national level can sometimes overshadow some of the very early developments that took place at the regional and the local levels. But policy initiatives and negotiations among their different actors had been taking place in this realm since the mid-1990s (Maluquer 1997; Nadal, Oliveres & Alegre 2003; FEMP 1995). The region of Catalonia, in particular, was a pioneer, having developed the first regional plan for integration in 1993. Other regions launched their own policies more recently, in 2000 or 2001. They include Madrid, Andalucía, Baleares, Canarias, Navarra and Aragón, all of which have high migrant percentages. Already in the mid-1990s, a number of places were launching policies at the local level, only to become more widespread at the turn of the millennium. In addition, some municipalities and social organisations such as NGOs, trade unions and migrant associations came to proactively promote the issue on the political agenda (Casey 1998b, Agrela Romero & Gil Araujo 2005).

⁴⁰ GRECO focused mostly on border control, while only one of the four guidelines deals with integration. GRECO's arguments follow that good management of migration in Spain means restricting the number of labour migrants so that national labour offers match demands for foreign work. Two key measures for accomplishing this are the strict control of flows and the promotion of migrants' return to their country of origin. A soft stance on migration would thus call other people to migrate to Spain.

⁴¹ The 2002 Report of the Delegation of Government for Alien Policy and Immigration declares an expenditure of 252 million euros on border control, centres of reclusion and services for asylum seekers and foreigners. In contrast, investments in integration are considerably less: 9 million euros for the covenants with regions; 12.6 million euros for subventions to social organisations offering services to migrants; and sundry funds given to refugee and immigrant reception centres.

In the absence of a guiding national policy, regional and local authorities regularly took initiatives to develop integration plans. This has resulted in great variety in the form, content, involvement of relevant actors and implementation of local and regional policies. Above all, diversity in policymaking processes has led to considerable inequalities across regions and cities (Diez Bueso 2003), particularly since more empowered autonomous communities tend to develop their own policies, but others do not. As a result, an immigrant's place of residence has a direct bearing on his or her access to welfare services (Martínez de Lizarrondo 2006). This only exacerbates the uneven geographical distribution of immigration, for populations tend to move to regions and localities that will have more favourable conditions for them. The inconsistencies may also create tensions between administrations concerning who has to foot the bill for the integration. The Catalan Plan, which lacked a clear financial budget, provides an illustration of this. While according to Catalan policymakers, the central state was responsible for funding integration policies, GRECO had not anticipated having to set forth a budget (Pajares 2004).

Despite the differences, regional and local policymaking processes also show important similarities. Firstly, when it comes to actual policy content, there are striking resemblances among regional plans' general principles and goals⁴² (Martínez de Lizarrondo 2006). An important feature shared by both levels is that they seldom distinguish between regular and irregular migrants. If and when they do, however, the distinction tends to vanish upon policy implementation.⁴³ This has had implications for the policymaking process, particularly because not distinguishing between legal and illegal⁴⁴ immigrants promotes the inscription of irregular migrants in the municipal register. This identification works as the onset of a sort of partial regularisation process.⁴⁵ Sub-national governments 'survive' by ⁴² Basic principles framing regional policies are: equality of rights and opportunities of migrants, normalisation (or the tendency to resort to general policies), transversality, gender equality, decentralisation and social participation (Pajares 2004).

⁴³ According to Martínez de Lizarrondo (2006), Madrid is the only region that formally excludes irregular migrants from public (specialised) services. However, Tamayo and Carrillo (2002) aver that this policy gets blurred in practice.

⁴⁴ Throughout this chapter, the terms 'irregular', 'illegal' and 'undocumented' are used synonymously in reference to migrants.

⁴⁵ As Solanes Corella (2004) observes, the municipal register is a double-edged sword. Local governments, in collaboration with regional ones, tend to use it as a mechanism of inclusion – by extending service access to all undocumented foreigners who register as residents (as sanctioned by law 4/2000) – rather than as an instrument of control – by trying to protect registry data from making irregular migrants visible in order to develop policies and services for these citizens to protect their rights while, at the same time, negotiating fiscal compensations with the central government (Tamayo & Carrillo 2002). Still, despite this general tendency, the legal status of migrants implies different levels of access to social-protection schemes depending on region or municipality. In some regions migrants are often channelled towards special charity programs supplied by private agencies and NGOs, although de iure they should have access to the general social schemes (Agrela Romero & Gil Araujo 2005).

Secondly, we find similarities regarding decision-making styles. Regional and local plans have tended to be reactive in nature, focusing on preventing serious problems (marginality, violence, insecurity, exploitation, etc.). Analysis of the type of instruments developed vis-à-vis integration shows how such actions have mainly taken place in first reception services and the social services sector (Tamayo & Carrillo 2002; Bruquetas-Callejo 2007; Martínez de Lizarrondo 2006). These priorities can be explained by the fact that sub-national actors have little influence over the growth of immigrant populations in their territory and, yet, they lack the resources and technical capacity to handle them. For example, inaction by some regional governments overloads the local authorities with responsibility. These policies can generally be characterised as technocratic in their development, being designed behind closed doors by civil servants and internal experts. As such, there is little political discussion and negotiation between actors. A minority of regions have managed to cultivate greater interaction among independent experts (e.g. Navarra),⁴⁶ civil society actors and immigrants themselves. The dominance of policymaking in the administrative arena has led to comprises, if not huge inconsistencies, between policy intentions and goals of the political elites in power. For example, the Catalonia Plan (1993, 1998), as executed under the rightwing government until late 2003, wove a symbolic banner for multiculturalism and yet still deployed instruments promoting the importance of the Catalan language and culture vis-à-vis immigrant integration (Cais 2004).

Despite the predominance of civil servants as actors, regions reflect a great diversity of policy actors involved in the decision-making network. Zapata (2003) has made a quantitative effort to describe different networks operating per region. He found that, while in some regions the public administration clearly dominates the process (e.g. Andalucía), in others, pressure groups⁴⁷ play the most important role, followed by NGOs and immigrant organisations (e.g. Catalonia, where public administration modestly figures in at third place).

Thirdly, in the implementation dimension the networks of actors involved vary not only per locality, but also per policy sector. Whereas, in some sectors (e.g. education), there is an obvious predominance of public actors and residual participation by private and social actors, other sectors (e.g. social services) have management networks largely linking the regional administration and the civil society actors. The role of subsidised policy implementors has arisen from the police access (as permitted by law 8/2000).

⁴⁶ The formulation of policies by public officers often implies that experts within the administration develop measures. Some regions have developed public services that specialise in supporting local authorities in the elaboration of integration policies (for instance, CRID in Catalonia). We, however, believe that decision-making should remain predominantly in the domain of civil servants.

⁴⁷ Under the category of 'interest groups', Zapata includes trade unions, religious organisations, employers organisations, federations and foundations, among others.

dominant national pattern in which a majority of autonomous communities have made first reception a top priority and thus assigned integration management to the Social Services Department (Martínez de Lizarrondo 2006). In their study on the Community of Madrid, Tamayo and Carrillo (2002) described such a network of actors – comprising the regional administration and non-governmental actors – whose relations are based on two basic instruments: the system of conditioned subventions and the contracts for service delivery. The autonomous communities made the choice to transfer part of the responsibilities for immigrants' needs to NGOs and other social bodies. The CASI (Centros de Atención Social a Inmigrantes) network in Madrid is another illustration of how the management of social issues was transferred from the regional government to NGOs and private companies (Gil Araújo 2004). SAIER (Service for Attention to Immigrants and Refugees) in Barcelona is a comparable case (Bruquetas-Callejo 2007), although one could say that this organisation is not altogether non-governmental.

At the other side of the spectrum, there are examples of bottom-up network experiences in regional and local policymaking and implementation. For instance, Catalonia has had cases of self-organisation among citizens that have produced compelling policymaking initiatives and networks (Pascual 1997; Morén-Alegret 2002a, 2002b). The city of Barcelona had set up an Advisory Board on Foreign Immigration and Refugees as early as 1986, a pioneer experience in integration policies (Morén-Alegret 2001).

Civil society

Actors from Spanish civil society⁴⁸ have had a remarkable presence in the domain of integration policies. First of all, they have been the frontline providers of basic services for immigrants since the very beginning of their settlement in Spain during the mid-1980s. Beyond purely implementing regional or local policies, social organisations formulate their own projects and seek the subsidies of public authorities. These actors have delivered a broad array of services including: juridical support, reception facilities, language training, employment services, health care, child after-school programmes, adult education and home rental intermediation. In addition, as we mentioned earlier, these actors have actually tried to influence policymaking by explicitly demanding that public administrations develop integration schemes. Their efforts have had at least two visible results: placing immigrant integration on the political agenda (Girona Report, CAONGCG 1992) and swaying public opinion to favour migrants and support the granting of equal rights to foreigners on grounds of residence (in particular, the right to benefit from welfare state provisions). This has noticeably shaped the issue of integration in terms of human rights and equality of opportunities for migrants.

Nonetheless, civil society organisations have not had a substantial influence on the decision-making processes of integration policies in the formal arenas. Casey (1998a, 1998b) concludes that, until the mid 1990s, Spanish NGOs had not yet been able to establish themselves as strong, independent actors in policy processes related to immigration and integration. Yet, their indirect role was crucial for pushing the issue on the political agenda and influencing how a particular problem might be defined. Public authorities also came to recognise the legitimacy that social actors had in the policy domain because of their access to migrant groups. While public measures primarily apply general schemes, authorities have found it useful to arrange special measures for immigrants through social organisations (Agrela Romero & Gil Araujo 2005; Dietz 2000).

⁴⁸ One basic typology of civil society organisations distinguishes between Spanish NGOs supporting immigrants and associations of immigrants (Casey 1998). The former focus on delivering services for migrants, while the latter tend to take up political representation duties in public institutions. Since the former task list implicates more resources and thus more influence than the latter, tensions are likely to arise among the various social actors (Tamayo & Carrillo 2002). Other immigrant-supporting organisations include trade unions, cultural associations and spontaneously formed groups that mobilise for specific migrant causes.

There are three main factors that explain why participation by social organisations has remained only indirect and, at that, variable, not reaching a more structured position in the decision-making process. These factors include: the inefficiency of the instruments developed for the participation of social actors (e.g. the Forum), the strong financial dependence social organisations have on public administration and the lack of coordination among social organisations. Social actors such as NGOs and immigrant associations have often been given specific tasks (and budgets) to implement integration policies at the local and regional levels, as mentioned above. This delegation changed the position of such partners vis-à-vis administrative and political authorities and, to a certain extent, may have altered their very nature. Many organisations that initially consisted almost exclusively of volunteers now have a significant percentage of contracted personnel in order to provide services subcontracted or promoted by the public administration. In many cases this has meant that both the voluntary nature and ideological impetuses of NGOs have taken the backseat and, moreover, that such organisation have become very economically dependent on public administration.⁴⁹

6. Conclusions

The Spanish policymaking pattern in the fields of immigration and integration presents several specific features. Fundamental is separation of the policymaking system into the two distinct subsystems of immigration and integration. Although, in other countries, one policymaking model predominates (at least for certain periods of time), in Spain, a bipolar model prevails. Pressure to link these two fields has been mounting since the mid-1990s. One sign of this is the demand some autonomous communities make for obtaining competence in migration. The demand has been backed by the argument that, without such responsibilities, regions cannot produce effective integration policies. However, the path towards greater interdependence between the two fields has not evolved into a single, unique model; rather, it has reinforced Spain's bipolar system. As such, the immigration and integration policy subsystems still function highly independently.

⁴⁹ Ruiz Vieitez highlights four additional changes that may take place within such organisations: diminishment of a long-term strategy; influence by personal or practical interests within the organisation; loss of a culture of inter-organisational coordination and networking; and a weakening international presence (Ruiz Vieitez 2003: 186).

Each field has its own predominating operational logic and accompanying set of actors who participate in decision-making processes.

The distribution of responsibilities within the autonomous community system means that distinct actors at different levels of authority take responsibility for formulating policies in the two respective fields. This governance pattern thus entails dissimilar policymaking strategies. As for immigration, the national government has had total responsibility over its related decision-making and policymaking has consequently followed a distinct top-down direction. In the field of integration, the Spanish central government had, only until recently, been reluctant to dedicate significant efforts to integration policies. Decentralisation of social policies has assigned integration responsibilities to the regions and municipalities. Bottom-up responses have hence been extraordinarily diverse vis-à-vis the autonomous communities, municipalities and civil society organisations.

Another difference between the two policymaking subsystems is the degree of their continuity. While the field of migration is characterised by relative continuity, the integration domain is quite the opposite. Interventions in immigration policy have proven considerably consistent over time and throughout political changes because the field has been dominated by a single actor, namely, the central state. The policy style predominating Spanish politics also helps account for the degree of continuity in each subsystem: political elites are described as residing in a position somewhere between little inclination to negotiate between parties and the need to do so for the sake of reaching governing coalitions. In the latter instance, changes in immigration policy have often been approached through modification of an implementing regulation, as opposed to substitution with a brand-new one. The consistency of migration policy may also be explained by the fact that Spain's main political parties (i.e. the PSOE and the PP) have had rather similar approaches. By contrast, stances on integration have been dissimilar – if not altogether conflicting – particularly on the issue of access to welfare services for irregular immigrants. In this regard, political colour seems a viable variable, running the gamut of positions within the field of integration. Since integration policies imply more political conflict between political parties they have been regionalised and localised, as well as mostly approached through administrative regulations.

The subsystems have also been receptive to dissimilar factors in the framing of policies. When it comes to immigration, the EU has played a leading role to initiate policymaking. These efforts were undertaken before immigration had even become a significant phenomenon and, later, in response to pressure to conform with general EU rules and principles. As for integration, grass-roots organisations and local authorities have created bottom-up pressure to trigger policymaking from below. The immigration/integration issue came to be defined in a highly politicised climate. It was shaped by several political mobilisations pro- and against- migrants (like racist events in El Ejido and Can Anglada and mobilisations of irregular migrants in Barcelona and other major cities demanding residence and work permits). The balance that developed between these forces can be read from the different versions of the Foreigners Law: while in the first and third versions of the law (8/2000), a European-wide top-down pressure dominated, the second version (4/2000) tried to introduce the logic of integration and to respond to the specificity of local needs.

These general tendencies, as they evolved over the years, need to be viewed in a nuanced light. Two elements, in particular, should be noted. First, although the domains are seen as distinct, the attention immigration gets undoubtedly dominates that given to integration. As such, the policy goals of the former have priority over those of the latter. The heavy emphasis on labour explains not only the chronology of integration policies, but also their reactionary character and primary focus on first reception. Second, within the field of immigration, social actors have put bottom-up pressure on regional and local governments to produce regularisations. Since regularisation has come to represent the primary avenue for conferring legal status on a migrant, we deduce that immigration policies have in practice gone far beyond national authorities' competence.

Finally, this policymaking pattern has produced inconsistencies. More than anything else, exceedingly separate relations between policy actors have produced two fundamental paradoxes. The first is that the model lacks inter-governmental instruments that can guarantee the coherence of policies. Each domain operates independently and the facilities meant to integrate these two policy areas (government delegation, Institute of Migrations and Social Services, the Forum and the Superior Council for Migratory Policy) have proved insufficient. Furthermore, the regionalisation and localisation of integration policies has been implemented without sufficient coordination between administrations and sectors. An absence of multilevel cooperation reflects a problematic within the system of the Spanish autonomous communities overall. The state has established a very decentralised power structure without resolving the articulation of the whole system in a satisfactory way (Aja 1999).

The second paradox is that even though organised civil society has no formal access to decision-making forums, civil society organisations have brought integration policy to fruition, both informally and at the operative level. Public authorities have even mimicked these civic initiatives. Up until recently, the framing of policies at the national level has tended to produce measures in immigration, rather than integration. The change in attitude, however, opened up opportunities for social organisations to generate a number of integration-related initiatives on all levels. A lack of receptivity towards stakeholders and civil society and a lack of coordination among social organisations has nonetheless stymied the potential impact such actors could have on policymaking.

The above analysis suggests that macro-political factors have had a significant influence on immigration and integration policymaking. How the general regime's political system has functioned has, to a great extent, shaped the policy elaboration processes in the two fields. Key variables in these processes are the political style vis-à-vis an increasingly difficult-to-achieve equilibrium between conflict and negotiation and the institutional arrangements of the welfare state for which the autonomous communities model made provisions. Within a national context defined by macro-political characteristics, bottom-up pressure by grass-roots organisations and local actors has exerted some sway. Although mostly indirect, this influence has been especially visible in the integration domain. As for the field of immigration, policies have been fundamentally framed within a supra-national context, as pressure moves top-down from the level of the European Union.

Bibliography

- Agrela, B. (2000), 'Líneas fundamentales de las políticas de acción social e intervención con población inmigrante extranjera en España a partir de fuentes documentales', in L. Pernía, M. García-Cano Torrico et al. (eds.), Inmigrantes en la frontera de la ciudadanía, 35-48. Málaga: Diputación Provincial de Málaga.
- Agrela Romero, B. & S. Gil Araujo, (2005), 'Constructing otherness: the management of migration and diversity in the Spanish context'. Migration: A European Journal of International Migration and Ethnic Relations 43/44/45 (Special issue on Spain): 9-33.
- Alegre, R. (2001), 'Polítiques d'immigració a Catalunya (1985-2000): entre la inserció i la precarització dels col·lectius immigrants', in R. Gomà, & J. Subirats, Govern i polítiques públiques a Catalunya (1980-2000): Autonomia i benestar. Barcelona: UAB.
- Aparicio Wilhelmi, M. & E. Roig Molés (2006), 'La entrada por razones laborales y el trabajo de los extranjeros. El progresivo desarrollo de un sistema ordenado de entrada laboral', in E. Aja & J. Arango, Veinte años de inmigración en España. Perspectivas jurídicas y sociológica (1985-2004), 145-174. Barcelona: CIDOB.
- Aragall, X. (2001), 'Migracions i polítiques públiques a Catalunya: una aproximació al paper dels actors'. Scripta Nova: Revista electrònica de geografia y ciencias sociales. Barcelona: Universitat de Barcelona.
- Aragon Bombin, R. (1996), 'Diez años de política de inmigración'. Migraciones 0: 45-59.
- Arango, Joaquin (2004), 'Dificultades y dilemas de las inmigración', Circunstancia: Revista de Ciencias Sociales, 2: 1-25.
- Arqué, M. (1998), 'Polítiques d'immigració i polítiques d'integració des de la perspectiva municipal'. VVA: Jornades sobre polítiques d'immigració i polítiques de integració, 45-49. Girona: Fundació Càritas Immigració.
- Aubarell, G. (ed.) (2003), Reflexions i experiències sobre les polítiques d'immigració a Catalunya. Barcelona: IEMED.
- Bruquetas-Callejo, M. (2007). 'The mobilization of immigrants in Barcelona 2001 and the founding of the local field of integration policy', in Patrycja Matusz Protasiewicz, Elżbieta Stadtmüller (eds.), Europa – ziemia obiecana. Doświadczenia krajów europejskich w integracji imigrantów, 117-145. Wrocław: Wydawnictwo Uniwersytetu Wrocławskiego.
- Cabellos Espiérrez, M.A. & E. Roig Molés (2006), 'El tratamiento jurídico del extranjero en situación regular', in E. Aja & J. Arango, Veinte años de inmigración en España. Perspectivas jurídicas y sociológica (1985-2004). Barcelona: CIDOB.
- Cachon, L. & M.S. Valles (2003), 'Trade unionism and immigration: reinterpreting old and new dilemmas'. Transfer. The European Review of Labour and Research 9 (3): 469-482.
- Cais, J. (2004), El dilema del modelo catalán de incorporación de inmigrantes: cultura vs. Comunidad, paper presented at the VII Congreso de la Federación Española de Sociología, 23-25 September, Alicante.
- Calavita, K. (2005), Immigrants at the Margins. Law, Race, and Exclusion in Southern Europe. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Calavita, K. (2003), 'The dialectics of immigrant "integration" and marginality in industrialising America and post-industrial Europe'. Transfer. The European Review of Labour and Research 9 (3): 416-431.
- CAONGCG (1992), 'L'informe de Girona: 50 propostes sobre immigració'. Documents 27, Centre UNESCO de Catalunya.
- Carrillo, E. & L. Delgado, 1998. El entorno, los instrumentos y la evolución de la política de inmigración en España (1985-1996). Madrid: Instituto Universitario Ortega y Gasset.
- Casey, J. (1998a), Non-Government Organizations (NGOs) as Policy Actors: The Case of Immigration Policies in Spain, PhD dissertation. Barcelona: University Autònoma de Barcelona, Department of Political Science and Public Law.
- Casey, J. (1998b), 'Las políticas de inmigración: la regulación de la admisión y la acción integradora', in R. Gomà & J. Subirats (eds.), Políticas públicas en España. Contenidos, redes de actores y niveles de gobierno, 317-340. Barcelona: Ariel.

- Casey, J. (1998), 'Les polítiques d'immigració: el marc dels debats actuals'. Ambits de Política i Societat 9: 17-19.
- Colectivo IOE (2001), Política migratoria española en el marco europeo. Studi Emigrazione 38 (144): 855-868.
- CRID: Consorci de recursos per a la Integració de la Diversitat (2004), Elements per a una actuació Municipal de Recepció i Acollida d'immigrants. Barcelona: Diputació de Barcelona.
- CRID: Consorci de Recursos per a la Integració de la Diversitat (2001), Món Local i diversitat. Estratègies, polítiques i serveis municipals per a la integració de persones immigrants no comunitàries. Barcelona: Diputació de Barcelona. Xarxa Municipis.
- De Lucas, J. (2005), La integración política como condición del modelo de integración. Documentación social 139: 53-72.
- Diez Bueso, L. (2003), 'El marc competencial i legal de les polítiques migratòries', in J. Guillot, (ed.), Immigració i poders locals. Barcelona: Institut de ciències polítiques i socials.
- Dietz, G. (2000). El desafío de la interculturalidad : el voluntariado y las organizaciones no-gubernamentales ante el reto de la inmigración. Granada-Barcelona: Laboratorio de Estudios Interculturales/ Fundación "La Caixa".
- Diputació de Barcelona (1997), II Informe sobre immigración y trabajo social. Diputació de Barcelona/ Servicio de servicios sociales. Barcelona: Diputació.
- Donaldson, M., A. Montardit, Ll. Pelàez & J. Monteserín (2002), '¿Hasta dónde llegan las fronteras? Inmigración, leyes de extranjería y movimientos sociales', in P. Ibarra, S. Martí & R. Gomà (eds.), Creadores de democracia radical. Movimientos sociales y redes de políticas públicas. Barcelona: Icaria.
- Fernández, A. (1998), 'Políticas de inmigración y políticas de integración desde la perspectiva municipal', in VVAA: Jornades sobre polítiques d'immigració i polítiques de integració. Girona: Fundació Càritas Immigració.
- FEMP (Federación española de municipios y provincias) (1995). Los municipios y la integración social de los inmigrantes: análisis y propuestas de actuación. Madrid: FEMP.
- Gil Araujo, S. (2004a), 'Gobernando a distancia: el papel de las ONG en la gestión de la integración de inmigrantes', paper presented at the at IV Congreso sobre Inmigración en España, Girona, 10-13 November 2004.
- Gil Araujo, S. (2004b), '¿De qué hablan cuando hablan de integración? Hacia el análisis comparado de las políticas autonómicas de integración de inmigrantes: los casos de Cataluña y Madrid', paper presented at VIII Congreso de la Federación Española de Sociología, Alicante, 23-25 September 2004.
- Hammar, T. (1985), European Immigration Policy: A Comparative Study. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Izquierdo, A. (2001), 'La política hacia dentro o el sistema de inmigración irregular en España', epilogue to S. Sassen ¿Perdiendo el control? La soberanía en la era de la globalización. Barcelona: Edicions Bellaterra, 107-137.
- King, R., Fielding, A. & Black, R. (1997), 'The International Migration Turnout in Southern Europe', in R. King & R. Black (eds.), Southern Europe and the New Immigrations. Brighton: Sussex Academic Press.
- López Sala, A.M. (2005a), Inmigrantes y Estados: la respuesta política ante la cuestión migratoria. Barcelona: Anthropos.
- Lopez Sala, A.M. (2005b), 'Matters of State? Migration Policy-Making in Spain as a New Political Domain'. Migration: A European Journal of International Migration and Ethnic Relations 43/44/45 (Special issue Spain): 35-49.
- Maluquer, E. (1997), II Informe de immigració i treball social. Barcelona: Diputació de Barcelona.
- Martínez de Lizarrondo, A. (2006), '¿Un modelo español de integración de inmigrantes?: Una mirada a los planes de las Comunidades Autónomas', paper presented at the International Congress on Migrations and Social Policies in Europe. Universidad Pública de Navarra, Pamplona, 8-10 June 2006.
- Mayeur, C. (1997), 'Discurso y prácticas migratorias: contradicciones, hipocresías y efectos

- perversos de las políticas actuales'. Migraciones 2: 9-26.
- Morén-Alegret, R. (2001), 'Tuning the Channels: Local Government Policies and Immigrants' Participation in Barcelona', in A. Rogers and J. Tillie (eds.), Multicultural Policies and Modes of Citizenship in European Cities, 61-84. Aldershot: Ashgate.
- Morén-Alegret, R. (2002a), Integration and Resistance. The relation of social organisations, global capital, governments and international immigration in Spain and Portugal, Aldershot: Ashgate Publishers.
- Morén-Alegret, R. (2002b), 'Gobierno local e inmigración extranjera. Aproximación a los casos de Barcelona y Lisboa durante los años 90'. Migraciones 11: 25-81.
- Morén-Alegret, R. (2005a), Immigrants and immigration policy-making – the case of Spain. IMISCOE Working Papers, <<http://www.imiscoe.org/publications/workingpapers/index.html>>.
- Morén-Alegret, R. (2005b), 'Joining the human towers? Immigration and Social Organisations in a Small Town in Southern Catalonia'. Migration: A European Journal of International Migration and Ethnic Relations 43/44/45: 97-123.
- Morén-Alegret, R. (2006), 'Foreign Immigrants' Integration in Spain'. Canadian Diversity 5 (1): 80-85.
- Morén-Alegret, R. (2007), Bon cop de mà? Món casteller, Immigració estrangera i Integració a Catalunya. Barcelona: Editorial Mediterrània, Fundació Jaume Bofill, Obra Social Caixa Sabadell.
- Morén-Alegret, R. & M. Solana (2004), 'Foreign immigration in Spanish rural areas and small towns: current situation and perspectives'. Finisterra. Revista Portuguesa de Geografia XXXIX (77): 21-38 (Special issue on Migration in the Mediterranean Basin, edited by R. King and L. Fonseca).
- Moreno Fuentes, F.J. (2004), The evolution of immigration policies in Spain. Between external constraints and domestic demand for unskilled labour, paper 211. Working Madrid: Instituto Juan March de Estudios e Investigaciones.
- Moreno Fuentes, F.J. (2005), 'The evolution of Spanish immigration policies and their impact on North African migration to Spain'. Studies in Culture, Polity and Identities 6 (1): 109-135.
- Nadal, M., R. Oliveres & M.A. Alegre (2003), Las actuaciones municipales en Cataluña en el ámbito de la inmigración. Barcelona: Fundación Pi i Sunyer, Documentos Pi i Sunyer, 16.
- Pajares Alonso, M. (2006), Inmigración y políticas de integración social. Working paper 45/2004. Madrid: Fundación Alternativas.
- Pascual, J. (1997), Pla d'acollida i promoció dels immigrants no-comunitaris al Vallès Oriental. Granollers: AEP, Desenvolupament Comunitari.
- Pelàez, Ll., M. Donaldson, R. González & A. Montardit (2002), 'Las redes de apoyo a la inmigración y las políticas locales: El caso del programa Icària', in I. Blanco & R. Gomà (eds.), Gobiernos Locales y Redes Participativas, 255-276, Barcelona: Ariel.
- Ramos, J.A., I. Bazaga, L. Delgado and E. del Pino (1998), La política para la integración social de los inmigrantes: una perspectiva intergubernamental. Madrid: Instituto Universitario Ortega y Gasset, Documentos de Trabajo.
- Ramos, J.A. and I. Bazaga (2002), Gestión intergubernamental y política de inmigración en España: el caso de los procesos de regularización de inmigrantes, paper for VII Congreso Internacional del CLAD sobre la Reforma del Estado y de la Administración Pública. Lisbon, 8-11 October.
- Roig Molés E. (2007), 'La entrada por razones laborales en Cataluña', in E. Argullol i Murgadas (eds.) Inmigración y Transformación Social en Cataluña, 287-334 . Madrid: Fundación BBVA and Generalitat de Catalunya.
- Rojo, E. & I. Camós (2007), 'Ciudadanía: marco jurídico y políticas en materia de inmigración', in J.M. Paludàrias & C. Serra, (eds.), La migración extranjera en España: balance y perspectivas, 69-94. Girona: CCG Ediciones.
- Ruiz López, B. and E.J. Ruiz Vieytez (2001), Las políticas de inmigración: la legitimación de la exclusión. Bilbao: Universidad de Deusto.

- Ruiz Vieyetz, E.J. (2003), 'Spanish immigration policies: a critical approach from a human rights perspective', in D. Turton & J. González (eds.), 173-189. Immigration in Europe. Issues, Policies and Case Studies. Bilbao: Humanitarian Net.
- Ruiz Vieyetz, E.J. (2005), 'Immigration Policies and Linguistic Diversity', in M.L. Setien & T.L. Vicente (eds.), Cross-disciplinary views on migration diversity, 179-141. Bilbao: University of Deusto.
- Ruiz Vieyetz, E.J. (2006), Minorías, inmigración y democracia en Europa. Una lectura multicultural de los derechos humanos. Valencia: Tirant lo blanch/University of Valencia.
- Santolaya Machetti, P. (2007), 'Extranjería y nuevos Estatutos de Autonomía'. Revista d'Estudis Autonòmics i Federals 4: 159-181
- Santos, L. (2001), 'El debat polític entorn a les polítiques d'integració'. Ambits de Política i Societat 18, 26-30.
- Solanes, A. (2004), 'Las deficiencias de la política española sobre inmigración', in VVAA (eds), Inmigración, sociedad y estado. Una cuestión abierta. Sevilla: Junta de Andalucía, Consejería de Asuntos Sociales.
- Tamayo, M. & E. Carrillo (2002), La gestión intergubernamental y la integración de los inmigrantes: algunas reflexiones a partir del caso de la comunidad de Madrid, paper for VII Congreso Internacional del CLAD sobre la Reforma del Estado y de la Administración Pública. Lisbon, 8-11 October.
- Tamayo, M. & L. Delgado (1998), La definición del problema de la inmigración en España. Madrid: Instituto Universitario Ortega y Gasset.
- Watts, J.R. (1998), 'Strange Bedfellows: How Spanish Labor Union Leaders and Employers Find Common Ground on Immigration'. Policy Studies Journal 26 (4): 657-675.
- Zapata-Barrero, R. (2002), L'hora dels immigrants: esferes de justícia i polítiques d'acomodació. Barcelona: CETC/Proa.
- Zapata-Barrero, R. (2003), 'Políticas de acomodación de la inmigración y administración local: La gestión de la coexistencia', in J. Guillot (ed.), Immigració y poders locals: Ciutats i persones. Barcelona: Institut de Ciències Polítiques i Socials.
- Zapata-Barrero, R. (2003), 'Cambio estructural y redes de actores en las políticas de acomodación de los inmigrantes en España: una perspectiva desde el territorio', in G. Aubarell (ed.), Perspectivas de la inmigración en España, 327-348. Barcelona: Icaria.
- Zapata-Barrero, R. (2004), Inmigración, innovación política y cultura de acomodación en España. Barcelona: Fundació CIDOB.
- Zapata-Barrero, R., C. Adamuz & I. Martínez (2002), 'Estructuras institucionales y redes de actores en las políticas de acomodación de los inmigrantes en España: cultura de acomodación y cambio estructural', Paper for the VII Congreso Internacional del CLAD sobre la Reforma del Estado y de la Administración Pública, Lisboa, Portugal, 8-11 October.
- Zincone, G. & T. Caponio (2005), The multilevel governance of migration. IMISCOE Working Papers, <<http://www.imiscoe.org/publications/workingpapers/index.html>>.