Acknowledgments

A number of people have provided help and support in the writing of this Ph.D. dissertation.

First and foremost, I am greatly indebted to my dissertation advisor, Professor Bob Brouwer of the Department of Jurisprudence at the Faculty of Law at the University of Amsterdam. Bob has been an excellent mentor during the years I worked on this study. His questions and comments on my drafts were invariably perspicacious, yet were always presented in a gentle manner, thereby providing just the right mix of guidance, criticism and encouragement. Bob's support has been invaluable, and the final product has been improved substantially as a result of his numerous incisive questions and helpful suggestions.

I had the good fortune to be awarded a fellowship at Harvard Law School in 1995. The time spent at Harvard has greatly contributed to the development of some of the ideas articulated in this study. Professor Lewis Sargentich's course 'Legal Ideals' proved especially helpful in stimulating my thinking on a number of issues. Several of the insights in chapter 1 and 2 are derived from these lectures. I was also able to discuss ideas with Professor Sargentich during the earlier stages of writing this thesis.

At a later stage, I was fortunate to meet Professor David Lyons and to have the opportunity to attend his seminar on legal interpretation at Boston University. David graciously read an earlier version of chapter 1, as well as an earlier, concise version of chapters 4 and 5. He provided useful comments on all three chapters.

Joshua Cohen has spent many hours helping me formulate my thoughts. I am very grateful for his help in this respect as well as for his support in countless other ways. My children, Daniel and Lisa, contributed in their very own way by making sure I maintained a balanced perspective of life through it all.
